

Not only do I not want companies, whose services I have decided to discontinue, to be able to intrude into my home via my telephone for 18 months, but I don't want their affiliate companies to be able to intrude for 18 months hawking unrelated products. If any changes to the no call list are needed, they should be to eliminate the one call that the companies are allowed now and to more vigorously enforce the existing no call list law. If ever there was a law that was in the public interest, it would have to be the do not call list. The day it became available in my state, the lines were flooded and all but a small minority of people who either work in the telemarketing industry or live in a cave signed up. I would wager that even a significant portion of the people who work in telemarketing privately signed up to block the calls from their own industry at the very same time they publicly argued against the rule.
